Alongside Veterans, Doctors, and Advocates, Rep. Wild Discusses Veterans' Access to IVF

On Wednesday, I hosted advocates from our veteran and military family communities and local medical providers to talk about how we can protect access to IVF for our veterans. Our veterans face unique challenges when choosing to start or grow their families – they don't control what states they will raise their children in and may face service-related injuries that affect their fertility. That's why I was deeply disappointed that four of my colleagues would criticize the Department of Veterans Affairs for announcing they would provide even greater access to IVF for the brave men and women who defend our nation. These heroes deserve access to all the reproductive technologies available, not restrictions imposed by judges or politicians.

I'm also so grateful that I was able to partner with Battle Borne to host our roundtable. Located in Allentown, Battle Borne provides veterans with the physical, mental, and emotional care they need after their service, and facilitates connections with other community organizations. I was also thrilled to be joined at the roundtable by Julie Eshelman, founder and CEO of the Building Military Families Network, and Dr. Davolos and Dr. Anastasio from St. Luke's. I'll keep fighting to expand access to IVF for all members of our community through passage of my bill, the Access to Family Building Act, which would protect this fertility treatment in every single state.
