History on Hold

By Mike Piersa

BANGOR - Although the Hoist in Downtown Bangor does not bring up slate anymore, it does bring people together. To help volunteers and visitors keep their distance during the pandemic, the final stage of construction at the Hoist Pavilion and anticipated events have been put on hold. Having an entire industry put on pause is not new for quarry hoists. Day long shut downs for rain and seasonal shut downs lasting the entire winter were accepted as inevitable in the local slate industry. Many slate quarries voluntarily closed, some of them permanently, during World War I. In October of 1917 a slate industry meeting decided that their workers who could find new jobs in essential war time industries should do so. In the process, around 3,000 quarry workers from the region went to work for Bethlehem Steel, then a center for armament production.
