Since my mother-in-law died in early December, I have been thinking about support networks. After her death I felt overwhelmed, not only with the loss of someone who meant so much, but also because we needed to move my now-widowed, eighty-five-year-old father-in-law into our home while we searched for a care facility. Her death also meant that we had to travel over an hour each way, on multiple occasions, to my husband's childhood home, to clean out forty-five years worth of memories to get the house ready to put on the market.

Only one childhood friend of my husband's remained in his hometown, so we had limited access to help near his old neighborhood. When we moved to Pennsylvania fifteen years ago, for my husband to pursue a job opportunity, the reverse was true. All of our support networks: family, friends, work colleagues, and caring neighbors were in the town we left behind. Now the majority of support surrounds us in the community we moved to years ago. Meals were prepared and delivered to us in the weeks after her death and offers to help box up the house, despite the distance, were made. Sadness permeated the holiday season for our family, but these acts of kindness buoyed us. Just knowing that people cared enough to drop off a meal or forego plans with their own family to help our family put slivers of light into what often felt like a dark room.

Big life changes like birth and death require support. Support from family and friends is usually time limited as the flood of assistance initially offered slowly recedes. I looked out to the broader community for information on an independent living facility for my father-in-law and was surprised to realize finding a quality facility in the area wouldn't be so difficult if I applied the same principals I advise families to use when looking for high quality child care.

I looked at what was available in my area, asked for recommendations, and most importantly, relied on the U.S. government ranking of every Medicare and Medicaid nursing facility at medicare.gov. I found out over 15,000 nursing facilities have a 5-star ranking. Luckily, some of those recommended by people I respect made the list. The star ranking of nursing facilities is similar to the Pennsylvania Keystone STARS (<http://www.pakeys.org/keystone-stars>) continuous quality improvement system for child care centers. When a family is looking for high quality care for either the youngest or oldest member of their family they should remember the higher the number of stars designates program quality.

After narrowing down choices we toured a local 5-star facility and my husband and I, and most importantly, my father-in-law, liked what we saw. When I returned to drop off paperwork I arrived prior to my scheduled appointment – giving me the opportunity to sit and observe staff and resident interactions. The staff, ranging from administrators, nursing and support, was kind and friendly to the residents, the residents were socializing and engaging in activities, and the place was as clean as I remembered it from my initial visit. You would want the same for your infant, so make sure you tour the child care center, see how staff engages with children (and how staff interact with each other), so you can spot any red flags with your own eyes prior to enrolling your child.

Remember that STAR 3 or 4 child care centers might have a wait list. We found this to be true with highly rated nursing care facilities too. Ideally, so you don't feel overwhelmed with finding care to help support your family during a major life change, prior to giving birth, or even before beginning a job hunt, is the time to start looking for a center.

Slate Belt Young at Heart Club Honor WWII Veteran

By Michael Ortoski

PEN ARGYL - At their monthly meeting in St. Elizabeth's Catholic Church in Pen Argyl the Slate Belt Young at Heart Club honored WWII Veteran Paul Pissante with a certificate of recognition from Senator Scavello and Rep. Marcia Hahn for his military service.

The president of the club Mary Lou Lohman did the presentation reading aloud the certificate. "In recognition of your exemplary military service and dedication and protecting the citizens of this great nation" were just part of the printed words honoring Pissante.

Also at their meeting by their request were Chair John Mauser and Vice Chair Michael Ortoski from 'Friends of Minsi Lake' to give a presentation on their groups plans for the rehabilitation of the lake and an update on the dam construction.

"I have had requests from several people in our group concerning the Minsi Lake project" said Lohman so she reached out to inquire if they would come and give a talk and slide show presentation.

After the Slide show presentation Mauser and Ortoski did a Q and A to help understand who Friends of Minsi Lake are and the overall plan for the lake.
