the retail food services industry that has struggled throughout this pandemic," Gov. Wolf said. "The self-certification ensures that restaurants can expand indoor operations and commit to all appropriate orders so that employees and customers alike can be confident they are properly protected."

Restaurants that self-certify will appear in the Open & Certified Pennsylvania searchable online database of certified restaurants across the commonwealth. Consumers will be able to access this database and find certified businesses in their area, ensuring that consumers can make more informed choices about the food establishments they are looking to patronize.

The self-certification documents and information about the Open & Certified Pennsylvania program can be found online starting September 21 and will contain the following:

A list of requirements contained in the current restaurant industry guidance and enforcement efforts; A statement that the owner has reviewed and agrees to follow these requirements;

The business' maximum indoor occupancy number based on the fire code; and A statement that the owner understands that the certification is subject to penalties for unsworn falsification to authorities.

Any restaurant that wishes to increase to 50 percent indoor capacity on September 21 must complete the online self-certification process by October 5. Business owners should keep a copy of the self-certification confirmation they will receive by e-mail. Social distancing, masking, and other mitigation measures must be employed to protect workers and patrons. Further, starting September 21 restaurants that have alcohol sales will close alcohol sales at 10:00 PM.

Additionally, restaurants that self-certify will be mailed Open & Certified Pennsylvania branded materials, such as window clings and other signage designating their certification, which they can display for customers and employees.

The self-certification will be used as part of ongoing enforcement efforts conducted by Department of Agriculture and Pennsylvania State Police Bureau of Liquor Control Enforcement, and will be shared with the departments of State, Labor & Industry and Health, and other enforcement agencies. Restaurants operating at 50 percent capacity will have their self-certification status checked as part of ongoing enforcement by these agencies starting on October 5, and will focus on educating businesses. The commonwealth will continue its measured approach to easing restrictions, keeping the rest of the targeted mitigation tactics specific to the food retail industry in place as restaurants increase capacity to 50 percent.

Here's Your Sign

What you don't know can't hurt you. I think whoever said that was trying to hurt someone. In fact what you don't know can kill you. At the very least knowing something isn't a bad thing. We can't live in a vacuum and as is proven daily, we can always ignore things we already know like traffic laws, safety rules and even math. But if you really don't know things, it's your job to learn them. No homework will be assigned when you get a credit card and don't understand what the interest rate is and what it will do to your balance. No class in school ever taught me how to setup a budget to make sure I could pay my bills every month. I learned it on my own many years ago when computers were the size of railroad cars. Well maybe more like a suitcase, but certainly not something that could fit into my pocket. Today the world is at our fingertips and I still see people making very bad decisions about large expenses and taking advice from franchise owner snake oil salesmen. Even home warranty and car warranty sales people are in it for the money and not to make your life easier. They get a cut right off the top and you have to fight through miles of red tape to get something fixed. They are the ones that know things and it is statistics. A certain percentage of things will break and a certain percentage of people will get worn down before they get their claim paid and a certain percentage of people will forget they even have the warranty, and a certain percentage of people will violate the warranty terms by some minor infraction and be ineligible for the payout. You know what that leaves? A rich corporation and a lot of people answering phone calls and lots of misleading advertisements. It's not really your fault but if you thought that a $99 policy was going to get you a new $800 water heater or a new air conditioner, here's your sign. Choosing who you deal with and how you allow yourself to be treated is the most important individual thing you can do. If you get caught up in the save-a-buck mentality, you will inevitably be taken advantage of by someone who tunes in to your weakness and exploits it. In the end the pay-as-you go plan will payoff every time. Maybe not today or next week, but over the long haul you will have responsible people fixing your stuff and using good quality parts.
